A whole range of developments in post-industrial societies are now considered to be near-crises in their significance. In the last two decades talk has been of crises such as the “labour market”, “social welfare state”, “financial”, “environmental”, “climate change”, “demographic” and “national state” crises. Of course here the question immediately arises of how crisis phenomena should be defined and diagnosed. It can be assumed that each society differentiates which developments, each in its context of space and time, deserve to be called “crises”.

Today’s diagnosed crises usually extend to some degree beyond the borders of single societies and have an international or even global character. A range of developments considered to be near-crises are in fact based on the interaction between societies: europeanisation and globalisation spring to mind; they produce winners and losers not only in the crisis regions, but also beyond, and their effects are dealt with at least in part by international actors such as the EU, OECD etc.

While the various types of crises have been relatively broadly studied, there has been less research on how societies react to developing ones. Here first of all the character of a society’s reactions is of interest: Who are the relevant actors in each case? Do crises-like developments lead to shifts in power relations between the relevant actors? In how far do actors’ reactions lead to change and if so, which kind of change? These are the central issues of the Conference “Responses to Crises” for the 10th Anniversary of the Centre for Globalisation and Governance (CGG). Researchers of the different CGG Research Areas as well as Young Researches provide insight in their findings and discuss the role of social and economic sciences in dealing with the crises.
