

Russia's ongoing war against Ukraine has created a substantial overlap between two interdisciplinary fields of expertise that have had little in common for the last thirty years: peace and conflict studies and East European studies in general and Ukrainian studies in particular.

Experts from both areas are contributing substantially to the public debates, and both fields have been reshaped by Ukrainian refugee scholars who were forced to leave their country. While the effects of these shifts on research are difficult to ascertain, they have had immediate effects on university teaching and the public sphere. The number of scholarly seminars and public events dealing with the Ukrainian past and present has grown exponentially. The question, now, is how the new status of Ukraine as an object of professional and public interest can and should change not only peace and conflict studies on the one hand and East European studies on the other but also the relationship between them.

By focusing on the case of Germany, this symposium will critically examine the recent developments in and between peace and conflict studies and East European studies, including different disciplinary approaches, old and new controversies, fruitful encounters and missed opportunities. First, we want to discuss with German and Ukrainian scholars how the professional interest in Ukraine has changed in and between their fields of expertise. Second, we want to draw lessons from the ways in which experts' voices have co-created German public debates about Ukrainian affairs and which challenges they face when attempting to bring scholarly expertise to highly political debates. Third, by bringing together scholars from Ukraine and German-speaking countries, this event hopes to intensify the existing and create new intellectual ties – both individual and institutional.
